But the next day she tells her grandmother and the two get into a fight - and Kiai manages to grab her purse from under the counter, then takes off at full speed, and lands face-first into a cement building. There is a quick scene of Kiai saying "Hou, hou!" before throwing herself backwards, and then there's a closeup of her running after a man walking by. That's the moment I realised you need to have something real - something that people can actually see that can be read out loud - instead of a film shot over and over again because people can just see a face.. Why do you chose to use this footage in the new movie? At some point in the film, she gets a dream and we see Kiai and the rest of her town getting together for a "wonder day", when it's said that every kid born in this town has some kind of miracle in him or her. What is the film about? The film, which has been in development since 2006, sees the life of Kiai, a young woman who finds herself living in a small town in the state of Victoria where there is no electricity, meaning her clothes dry very quickly (like most people).
